West Germany: Peace Movement and INF

1. The next several months will witness a steady increase in anti-INF demonstrations, peace camp activities, and the attempted blockade of US military installations. There is a general consensus among analysts that the bulk of these actions will be free of violence and that they will not dissuade the Kohl government from implementing the deployment schedule this fall. However, a number of uncertainties bear watching:

- Media coverage is likely to overplay the confrontational aspects of anti-INF actions, especially those involving Americans

In spite of the uncertainties, most analysts suspect that the size and momentum of the movement may have peaked -- some estimates show roughly 100,000 activists and 1-2 million sympathizers. There could, however, be as many as 10,000 members of small, radical, autonomous groups that could be planning more violent actions. Ironically, the smooth handling of recent demonstrations by German and US authorities could inspire radicals to stage highly provocative actions against military installations and personnel. In this regard, the NATO Reforger military exercise this October could provide an opportunity for terrorist groups to attack small, dispersed US military units in the Frankfurt area.

West Europe/Central America

3. Analysts detect little change in West European attitudes toward Central America and US policies in the region. Publics remain ill-informed and dependent on news coverage that focuses on the US military intervention in Central America. Although a leftist minority has seen fit to integrate criticism of US Latin American policies into peace movement themes, the issue is not a salient one to most West Europeans. Moreover, West European governments are by no means united in their views on US Central American policies and have struck noticeably different postures. The lowest common denominator on Central America reflected at the recent EC Summit appears to be that:

- Central America's problems are primarily economic and social.
- A military solution in Central America does not exist.
- US attempts to cast Central American conflicts in an East/West context will be self-fulfilling.

These sentiments, however, will probably not translate into greater European pressure on the US. Most governments -- and even the Socialist International -- have become more disillusioned with the record of the Nicaraguan government and have become generally less outspoken on Central American problems.
